Although the health of urban communities generally suffers more than that of rural communities, the effects of urban renewal (UR) on community health are unclear. This study addressed this question, comparing the health of communities that were UR in the mid-20th century to those that were not. The data were obtained by administering a survey to a representative sample of the adult community residents of four cities: Boston, Chicago, Detroit, and Los Angeles. Two of these cities had undergone large-scale UR, while the others had not. The results indicate that the health of residents of UR communities was not different from that of their counterparts in the reference communities. The results of the present study demonstrate that a subcutaneous injection of galantine at the same dosage compared to the dose used for therapeutic purposes is safe. In addition, it shows that the treatment modality 04aeff104c
