Lightroom 5 has the ability to crop photos quicker and smarter. After importing a folder of images into Lightroom 5, you can crop them right in the Photo Organizer. [Note: This feature is currently in beta]. Cropping options will adjust based on the amount of information in each photo and a new Red Eye Reduction feature can reduce the chances of you creating photos with red eyes. If you're a frequent cropper, you'll love the new feature that suggests cropping options on the fly. Moving on from cropping, the whole experience of cropping photos is a faster and smoother one. For example, with the new zoom view, you now get a "full screen preview" as you zoom out on an image, with a smart guide showing where all the interesting elements are located. Additionally, you can use keyboard shortcuts to quickly zoom in and zoom out with less precision. There is also a new crop tool that now highlights the target image, as well as other selected photos, making it easier to select the photo you want to crop. One of the biggest complaints about "classic" lightroom, with its a lot of duplicate features, is how cumbersome it was to edit every single image in a collection. With Lightroom 5, the photo organizer has become more robust with smart collections, smart groups, and smart sorting at a glance. Also, Collections have been renamed to Moments. While this makes it marginally easier to remember what the larger collections are called, it's a pretty big "whoop de doo."
